What do you want for fun? Is it booze, casual sex, dancing, eating or doing drugs? These are all carnal sins according to the Bible. Dancing is an arrogant, boastful kind of act which goes against the Biblical definition of the virtuous woman.

I know what I do for fun. I try to get an intense inspired-euphoric feeling from the things I do, mostly physical activities. All I need is a stretch of warm water and I can swim for miles.

Anyway, just look at what cruise ships and all-inclusive resorts offer for fun. That's western society for you. Gluttony is an excess of frivolous pleasures. I'm not here to analyze anything.

This book is my attempt at a g-rated travel book but there are xxx-rated parts to it.

If you want to look at sexy fun, check out my sex book.

The only true hedonist I ever knew was a guy who lived in Montego Bay, Jamaica who owned his own bar. He was an American, about 50, with a few million bucks he earned as a businessman who went down there to retire, bought a beach house and a night club and spent his time between the two places, drinking a bit, doing drugs and finding young girls to have fun with.

The bar was a kind of disco dance bar that female tourists like because all woman like to dance to upbeat pop music and guys went there looking for chicks so it was a good place to meet someone. He worked behind the bar whenever he felt like it.

He placed ads on casual sex dating websites and paid for girls to come down and visit him for a week or two.

He hired local girls on occasion.

To me a hedonistic paradise is a place where sex for sale and recreational drugs are legal or at least tolerated by law enforcement who won't bother personal users much but it's kinda funny that in a supposedly free world, I have a hard time finding such places.

Holland is the world's most advanced country in this regard except that it has cold weather. Prostitution and soft drugs are legal and from what I know from talking to people who live there, they won't bother you with the hard drugs unless you're blatant about it. They usually only bust pushers.

It's nice in the summer.

Some hotels are quite expensive, some are cheap (in the redlight district) so look around before you part with your money.

The Netherlands owns the ABC Caribbean islands Aruba, Bonaire and Curacao plus a few islands Saba, St.

Eustice and St. Marteen.

I assume the laws are the same here, some legal drugs and legal redlight districts. If you know firsthand about these places, tell me about them so I can add that information to this book.

Pattaya, a coastal city south of Bangkok, Thailand is a pretty liberated place. There are a fair share of Americans and Aussies there. The town of Patong on Phuket, the island is pretty good too. Thailand has lots of inexpensive legal prostitution in the girlie bars and easy drugs available in the drug stores although the recreational drugs like heroin and grass are technically illegal even though it is commonplace in the tourist areas.

I know drugs are cheap in Jamaica although technically illegal and prostitution is technically illegal but they're both regular businesses for many of the locals.

A lot of countries have technical laws against drugs and prostitution but based on what I've heard, I know that Belize, Costa Rica and Mexico are all pretty easy access to both paid sex and recreational drugs.

Most of these countries willingly turn the blind eye to this stuff but when American media comes in, they have to act all upright in order to keep that conservative, upstanding image.

Ibiza, Spain is a hot place for sexy young Europeans looking for fun. It's an island in the Mediterranean coastal beach area where lots of young people go to party and lay in the sun. It has the biggest nightclub in the world which can hold over 12,000 people and there is always a bar open somewhere, all day and all night.

Pacha is the oldest nightclub there
